Mr. Lewis McKerzie, who presided over the Col. Cochran said that he was the candidate nee of himself and those friends who had pressed him to run. He had thought it an outrage that there should be no contest in this district, as though there were no differences of opinion existing. He had, at first, declined being a candidate, but had received letters from numerous friends urging him not to let the election go by default. He had finally, after con sultation with his wife, agreed to 31 dd to their advice, and to lead a foloro hope, if it was ne

The present Virginia delegation he considered an cutrage on the people; they were all original sucessionists, except Gov. Walker, and he was a northern abolitionist, working for the same end. They had all been nominated by machine polities and owing to sectional feelings. His fellow ecuntyman. James Barbour had been defeated in this way, and Mr. Lewis McKenzie had been left out at the expiration of one term, in the same manner. He culcgized Mr. McKerzie, whom he considered an able and faithful representative, and whom he had supported with his whole strength.

The speaker attacked the or ginal secessionists, the dectrine of States Rights and the Conservative Party, which last he said, he had aided in organizing, but thought it had now gone astray from its critical policy.
He prodaimed his belief in resumption and is hard money principles generally. He adverted to the exclusion of the delegations from Orange and the two Salem towrships in the late Congressional Convention, and said that he knew all of the inner workings of the Committee on Credentials. He thought Mr. Neale had been defrauded of the nomination, which justly belonged to him. If Hayes was a fraud, on account of the manner of his election, surely liuaton was one also, on account of the manper of his nomination.

Col. Cochran was listened to, attentively and was courteously treated, with the exeception of one or two slight interruptions, which were speedily suppressed. It was very evident how ever that his audience were not with lim in many of his views.

At the conclusion of Col. Cochran's spece), Mr. McKenzie came to the front, and after calling attention to the fact of so many people having for the West, which he thought a bad sign, he adjourned the meeting. Numerous calls were made for Mr. Edgar L. Breckett, but that gentleman did not respond.
